The Genesee River is the only river that completely crosses New York State. The river begins as a spring in Gold, PA, located in the Allegany Mountains and flows generally north 158 miles (254 km) to Lake Ontario.

The Genesee River tumbles over six waterfalls. At Portageville, midway along its course, the river flows into a 17 mile (27 km) long postglacial, winding, rocky gorge 600 feet (180 meters) deep. This gorge, cut into sedimentary rocks of the Appalachian Upland, is often called the "Grand Canyon of the East". Three waterfalls are located at the southern end of this gorge in Letchworth State Park. There is a flood-control dam at Mount Morris where the river leaves the gorge to enter a wide, pre-glacial, moraine-filled plain. In Rochester the river enters another gorge, 7 miles (11 km) long and contains three waterfalls that supply hydroelectric power to downtown. The total drop in elevation is nearly 2,240 feet (683 meters).
